

Not always irrelevant

Facebook has its uses. I made a post this week letting folk know I am leaving. People are very kind and made lots of generous comments. Several comments were from staff at Richmond Primary School. One person wrote this: "Your family are the lucky ones. We will so miss you at Richmond School. Go well."

One of the most amazing privileges, during my time here at Richmond Parish, has been acting as Chaplain to Richmond Primary. The teachers and staff there are so committed to developing children who will be valuable members of society. The School has always been good neighbours to our Church and that won't change with me going but we could lose the close connection we've enjoyed.

In our service last Sunday we talked about how church generally has been pushed to the margins of society. That may not be a bad thing. In fact, I suspect it is part of God's magnificent plan to get us off our collective butts and be who the Lord has made us to be.

We Christians still have some opportunities to have genuine and meaningful input into our wider community. Richmond School is keen to get another chaplain and they've given me permission to look into that. I'd love that person to be part of our church. Is God calling you to be their new Chaplain?

The time commitment is around 4 hours per week. Every chaplain works in different ways; ways which suit them and their gifting's and the school's needs. Before me the Chaplain organised games at lunch time. Other chaplains meet one on one with children. Some bake with children in the staff room. In the winter terms I have taken little groups of children through fun activities hopefully imparting great life skills along the way. The rest of the time I have lunch in the staff room with whoever is around. Then I go into the playground and just chat to children; especially those who are alone or seem a bit down.

It's not hard but is so rewarding. All you need really is to be friendly, to have 3 – 4 hours a week, and to be a good listener. Full training is given by the Churches Education Commission or Lifewalk as they are now called. The training covers everything that is needed.

Please let me know if you are interested. I will miss the team at Richmond School immensely but would be much cheered if our church continues this fantastic community building outreach. - Susan
